I have enjoyed using the Command-line interface. Even though it is quite simple to use, I feel like I'm doing some crazy hacking job. I'm excited to be learning a new language that most people will never understand. I do like the GUI better. I consider myself a very visual learner and where there are little pictures to accompany each button I find it easier to organize in my head. In CLI I feel like I am writing paragraphs and could easily get lost because everything is listed instead of separated out into its own categories. I like that I have the power to quickly click and drag whatever files I need to sort them as I please. I have not learned how to organize files in CLI but I'm guessing it will take longer and more memory power compared to GUI. I have enjoyed reading and working through the Unix for a Beginning Mage. Each time the new "spell" works on my own, I get way too excited. I feel as if it is a concept I can easily grasp. I think besides this class I will probably stick to using GUI.
